Elon Musk’s $56 billion Tesla pay package struck down again, Delaware Judge says board ‘improperly influenced...’

A US district judge has rejected Tesla chief Elon Musk's extravagant $56 billion pay package for a second time, according to a Bloomberg report. This comes despite shareholder support for the billionaire's salary claim, but the judge noted that the EV automaker's board was “improperly influenced” into accepting the payout. It added that Delaware Chancery Court Judge Kathaleen St. J. McCormick made the ruling on December 2, making it the second time that she has ruled against the same excessive pay package for Musk. She first struck it down in January. Musk’s record-setting pay was struck down once again by the same judge and could possibly strip the world's richest man's net worth of billions of dollars, the report noted. Judge McCormick stuck to her original ruling and said that Musk improperly influenced Tesla’s board when it adopted the billionaire’s plan in 2018.

Intel’s CEO Departure Opens Door to Fresh Deal Discussions

The abrupt departure of Intel Corp. Chief Executive Officer Pat Gelsinger offers a fresh opportunity for the troubled company to consider potential deal options, including scenarios that he rejected during his time running the chipmaker. The board has discussed a range of possibilities in recent months, such as private equity transactions and even a split of Intel’s factory and product-design businesses. But Gelsinger was opposed to breaking up the company, focusing instead on his plan to restore Intel’s technological edge and become a made-to-order manufacturer for outside clients. With Gelsinger leaving this week — following pressure from the board — there’s a chance to reset the conversation. Morgan Stanley and Goldman Sachs Group Inc. have been helping the company ponder its options, and may find a more receptive audience in new management.
